

Magnetic particles with an outer glass surface being essentially poreless or having pores of a diameter of less than 10 nm as well as ferromagnetic particles with a glass surface are preferentially useful for the isolation of biological material from samples. They provide a quick and reliable purification.